FSA A.06 05.0253
Drawings are arranged roughly in sequential number sequences, housed in document boxes or in flat file folders by size, and stored in the map case drawers.
Title is provided by FSg Archives staff based on Joseph Upton's Catalogue of the Herzfeld Archive and Thomas Leisten's publication, Excavation of Samarra, vol 1.
Drawings related primarily to the first campaign of excavation at Sāmarrā' (Iraq), carried out by Ernst Herzfeld on behalf of the Kaiser Friedrich Museum in Berlin in 1911.

Original handwritten notes on drawing reads, "Haus XI, früher Haus VII, Qaṭūn. Unpublished."

The identification of the residential sites: "Herzfeld numbered all sites while the excavation was still in progress. When it became obvious that two courtyards with adjacent rooms turned out to belong to the same complex, however, he assigned new numbers. Herzfeld gave numbers to 16 houses in various locations, splitting certain buildings into, for instance, House Va or Xlb, naming in all 24 different sites. [...]. Unfortunately, Herzfeld changed the numbering of the houses a third time when he finished the final drawings for the publication, including only 14 houses. [...]. In those cases in which Herzfeld noted on his field sketch either the name of the area or the new numbering of the house we can at least identify the site. These records indicate al-Quraina (Qurainah) as the location of Houses I to VI, connect al-Qāṭūn with House XI, the area of Ṣūr 'Īṣā with Houses VIII and IX, and a House XVII with Jubairiyya." [Leisten, Thomas, 2003: "Excavation of Samarra, v. I. Architecture : Final report of the first campaign 1910-1912. Verlag Philipp von Zabern, Mainz am Rhein, 2003; p.121."]

- Title is provided by Xavier Courouble, FSg Archives cataloger, based on Ernst Herzfeld original drawing's caption and Joseph Upton's Catalogue of the Herzfeld Archive.

Ernst Herzfeld first visited Naqsh-i Rostam in November 1905 during his expedition return from the Assur (Kalat Schergat, Iraq) excavation. During the two last months of 1923 as well as early March 1924, in addition of his work on the terrace of Persepolis, Herzfeld spent time at Naqsh-i Rostam checking the inscriptions. In 1928, the architect Friedrich Krefter joined Herzfeld in Persia, in an expedition funded by the Notgemeinschaft der Deutschen Wissenschaft, to complete various measured plans and drawings in Persepolis, Pasargadae, and Naqsh-i Rostam. On March 1, 1931, now under the auspices of the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago, excavations at Persepolis were begun. Ultimately, in 1933, attention was directed to Naqsh-i Rostam, where Herzfeld traced the outer enclosure of the site and copied the inscription on the tomb of Darius I. Ernst Herzfeld left Persepolis permanently in Spring 1934.

- Title is provided by Xavier Courouble, FSg Archives cataloger, based on Ernst Herzfeld original drawing's caption and Joseph Upton's Catalogue of the Herzfeld Archive.

Ernst Herzfeld first visited Naqsh-i Rostam in November 1905 during his expedition return from the Assur (Kalat Schergat, Iraq) excavation. During the two last months of 1923 as well as early March 1924, in addition of his work on the terrace of Persepolis, Herzfeld spent time at Naqsh-i Rostam checking the inscriptions. In 1928, the architect Friedrich Krefter joined Herzfeld in Persia, in an expedition funded by the Notgemeinschaft der Deutschen Wissenschaft, to complete various measured plans and drawings in Persepolis, Pasargadae, and Naqsh-i Rostam. On March 1, 1931, now under the auspices of the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago, excavations at Persepolis were begun. Ultimately, in 1933, attention was directed to Naqsh-i Rostam, where Herzfeld traced the outer enclosure of the site and copied the inscription on the tomb of Darius I. Ernst Herzfeld left Persepolis permanently in Spring 1934.

Handwritten caption on verso reads, "fig. 326."

- Title is provided by Xavier Courouble, FSg Archives cataloger, based on Ernst Herzfeld original drawings'caption and Joseph Upton's Catalogue of the Herzfeld Archive.
Ernst Herzfeld first visited the site of Taq-i Bustan (Iran) in early August 1913 while on an expedition from Samarra (Iraq) to Asadabad (Hamadan, Iran). The drawing may be related primarily to this expedition as well as to additional visits to Taq-i Bustan (Iran) carried out by Ernst Herzfeld in 1917 and 1923 (end of June).

Additional information from Ernst Herzfeld's 1941 publication, Iran in the Ancient East, reads, "There are three sculptures on the rocks behind the village of Sarpul on the Baghdad-Hamadan road. The most elaborate one represents a triumph of Annubanini, king of the Lullu, a tribe related to the Kashshu. The king stands before the goddess Ininna and puts one foot on the prostrate figure of an enemy; the goddess leads two prisoners, and in a lower register six more are drawn. [...] From the Akkadian inscription we may infer the time of Naram Sin of Akkad as the date of the sculpture." [Iran in the Ancient East. Archaeological Studies Presented in the Lowell Lectures at Boston. London: Oxford University Press, 1941. P.183-184.]

Drawings are arranged roughly in sequential number sequences, housed in document boxes or in flat file folders by size, and stored in the map case drawers.

- Title is provided by Xavier Courouble, FSg Archives cataloger, based on Ernst Herzfeld original drawing's caption and Joseph Upton's Catalogue of the Herzfeld Archive.

Additional information from Ernst Herzfeld's 1941 publication, Iran in the Ancient East, reads, "There are three sculptures on the rocks behind the village of Sarpul on the Baghdad-Hamadan road. The most elaborate one represents a triumph of Annubanini, king of the Lullu, a tribe related to the Kashshu. The king stands before the goddess Ininna and puts one foot on the prostrate figure of an enemy; the goddess leads two prisoners, and in a lower register six more are drawn. [...] From the Akkadian inscription we may infer the time of Naram Sin of Akkad as the date of the sculpture." [Iran in the Ancient East. Archaeological Studies Presented in the Lowell Lectures at Boston. London: Oxford University Press, 1941. P.183-184."]

- Title is provided by Xavier Courouble, FSg Archives cataloger, based on Ernst Herzfeld original drawing's caption and Joseph Upton's Catalogue of the Herzfeld Archive.

Ernst Herzfeld first visited Naqsh-i Rostam in November 1905 during his expedition return from the Assur (Kalat Schergat, Iraq) excavation. During the two last months of 1923 as well as early March 1924, in addition of his work on the terrace of Persepolis, Herzfeld spent time at Naqsh-i Rostam checking the inscriptions. In 1928, the architect Friedrich Krefter joined Herzfeld in Persia, in an expedition funded by the Notgemeinschaft der Deutschen Wissenschaft, to complete various measured plans and drawings in Persepolis, Pasargadae, and Naqsh-i Rostam. On March 1, 1931, now under the auspices of the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago, excavations at Persepolis were begun. Ultimately, in 1933, attention was directed to Naqsh-i Rostam, where Herzfeld traced the outer enclosure of the site and copied the inscription on the tomb of Darius I. Ernst Herzfeld left Persepolis permanently in Spring 1934.

Drawings are arranged roughly in sequential number sequences, housed in document boxes or in flat file folders by size, and stored in the map case drawers.

This Drawing may be related primarily to two expeditions to Paikuli (Iraq), in 1911 and 1913, as well as an excavation campaign carried out on site by Ernst Herzfeld in 1923.

Additional information from Helmut Humbach and Prods O. Skjærvø's publication reads, "The ruin of the Sasanian monument of Paikuli is situated close to the southern ascent to the [Paikuli] pass. Originally, the monument consisted of a solid square tower. Four identical colossal busts of one and the same king of kings were built into the four walls. The western wall bore a large Middle-Persian inscription (eight rows of blocks, with a total of 46 lines), whereas the eastern wall bore the Parthian version of this (seven rows, with a total of 42 lines, all of them surviving in a fragmentary state). The subject of the inscription, carefully carved and written in perspective, is the quarrel over the succession, between Narseh (293-303) and Varahrān (293)." [Helmut Humbach and Prods O. Ernst Herzfeld first visited Naqsh-i Rostam in November 1905 during his expedition return from the Assur (Kalat Schergat, Iraq) excavation. During the two last months of 1923 as well as early March 1924, in addition of his work on the terrace of Persepolis, Herzfeld spent time at Naqsh-i Rostam checking the inscriptions. In 1928, the architect Friedrich Krefter joined Herzfeld in Persia, in an expedition funded by the Notgemeinschaft der Deutschen Wissenschaft, to complete various measured plans and drawings in Persepolis, Pasargadae, and Naqsh-i Rostam. On March 1, 1931, now under the auspices of the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago, excavations at Persepolis were begun. Ultimately, in 1933, attention was directed to Naqsh-i Rostam, where Herzfeld traced the outer enclosure of the site and copied the inscription on the tomb of Darius I. Ernst Herzfeld left Persepolis permanently in Spring 1934.

Drawings are arranged roughly in sequential number sequences, housed in document boxes or in flat file folders by size, and stored in the map case drawers.

- Title is provided by Xavier Courouble, FSg Archives cataloger, based on Joseph Upton's Catalogue of the Herzfeld Archive.

Ernst Herzfeld first visited Persepolis in November 1905 during his expedition return from the Assur (Kalat Schergat, Iraq) excavation. During the two last months of 1923 as well as early March 1924, He spent six weeks on the terrace of Persepolis, drafting a plan and providing a photographic record of the whole structure. In 1928, the architect Friedrich Krefter joined Herzfeld in Persia, in an expedition funded by the Notgemeinschaft der Deutschen Wissenschaft, to complete various measured plans and drawings in Persepolis. Excavations were begun on March 1, 1931, now under the auspices of the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago. Ernst Herzfeld left Persepolis permanently in Spring 1934.

Ernst Herzfeld first visited Persepolis in November 1905 during his expedition return from the Assur (Kalat Schergat, Iraq) excavation. During the two last months of 1923 as well as early March 1924, He spent six weeks on the terrace of Persepolis, drafting a plan and providing a photographic record of the whole structure. In 1928, the architect Friedrich Krefter joined Herzfeld in Persia, in an expedition funded by the Notgemeinschaft der Deutschen Wissenschaft, to complete various measured plans and drawings in Persepolis. Excavations were begun on March 1, 1931, now under the auspices of the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago. Ernst Herzfeld left Persepolis permanently in Spring 1934.

Drawings are arranged roughly in sequential number sequences, housed in document boxes or in flat file folders by size, and stored in the map case drawers.

- Title is provided by Xavier Courouble, FSg Archives cataloger, based on Joseph Upton's Catalogue of the Herzfeld Archive.

Ernst Herzfeld first visited Persepolis in November 1905 during his expedition return from the Assur (Kalat Schergat, Iraq) excavation. During the two last months of 1923 as well as early March 1924, He spent six weeks on the terrace of Persepolis, drafting a plan and providing a photographic record of the whole structure. In 1928, the architect Friedrich Krefter joined Herzfeld in Persia, in an expedition funded by the Notgemeinschaft der Deutschen Wissenschaft, to complete various measured plans and drawings in Persepolis. Excavations were begun on March 1, 1931, now under the auspices of the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago. Ernst Herzfeld left Persepolis permanently in Spring 1934.

Ernst Herzfeld first visited Naqsh-i Rostam in November 1905 during his expedition return from the Assur (Kalat Schergat, Iraq) excavation.

During the two last months of 1923 as well as early March 1924, in addition of his work on the terrace of Persepolis, Herzfeld spent time at Naqsh-i Rostam checking the inscriptions. In 1928, the architect Friedrich Krefter joined Herzfeld in Persia, in an expedition funded by the Notgemeinschaft der Deutschen Wissenschaft, to complete various measured plans and drawings in Persepolis, Pasargadae, and Naqsh-i Rostam. On March 1, 1931, now under the auspices of the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago, excavations at Persepolis were begun. Ultimately, in 1933, attention was directed to Naqsh-i Rostam, where Herzfeld traced the outer enclosure of the site and copied the inscription on the tomb of Darius I. Ernst Herzfeld left Persepolis permanently in Spring 1934.

This Drawing may be related primarily to two expeditions to Paikuli (Iraq), in 1911 and 1913, as well an excavation campaign carried out on site by Ernst Herzfeld in 1923.

Additional information from Helmut Humbach and Prods O. Skjærvø's publication reads, "The ruin of the Sasanian monument of Paikuli is situated close to the southern ascent to the [Paikuli] pass. Originally, the monument consisted of a solid square tower. Four identical colossal busts of one and the same king of kings were built into the four walls. The western wall bore a large Middle-Persian inscription (eight rows of blocks, with a total of 46 lines), whereas the eastern wall bore the Parthian version of this (seven rows, with a total of 42 lines, all of them surviving in a fragmentary state). The subject of the inscription, carefully carved and written in perspective, is the quarrel over the succession, between Narseh (293-303) and Varahrān (293)." [Helmut Humbach and Prods O. Skjærvø's publication, 1980: "The Sassanian Inscription of Paikuli; Supplement to Herzfeld's Paikuli. Wiesbaden: Reichert; pp.13-16."]

- Additional information reads, "It was now well on in May 1917, and the little survey party which had followed the fortunes of the 3rd Corps was at last broken up. I (G. A. Beazeley) was transferred with my computer, to take charge of a detachment of two officers and eight surveyors to carry out a large-scale survey of Samarra and its neighbourhood. The scale selected was the 6-inch, and it was decided to call in the aid of air photographs, which were adjusted to a framework of points fixed by triangulation and plane-table intersection. The congregated photos were then reduced to the 6-inch scale, blue prints prepared and issued to the surveyors, who transferred the detail to their boards and carried out supplementary survey including contouring. Drawings are arranged roughly in sequential number sequences, housed in document boxes or in flat file folders by size, and stored in the map case drawers.

- Title is provided by Xavier Courouble, FSg Archives cataloger.

- Original caption in English reads, "T.C. 97(B). Samarra. Dated 14-10-1917. Samarra. Scale 1 inch to 1 mile. Compiled from 6th Survey by survey Party M.E.F up to 1-9-1917. Supplemented by Willcocks Irrigation map. Litho Section G.H.Q."

- Additional information reads, "It was now well on in May 1917, and the little survey party which had followed the fortunes of the 3rd Corps was at last broken up. I (G. A. Beazeley) was transferred with my computer, to take charge of a detachment of two officers and eight surveyors to carry out a large-scale survey of Samarra and its neighbourhood. The scale selected was the 6-inch, and it was decided to call in the aid of air photographs, which were adjusted to a framework of points fixed by triangulation and plane-table intersection. The congregated photos were then reduced to the 6-inch scale, blue prints prepared and issued to the surveyors, who transferred the detail to their boards and carried out supplementary survey including contouring. The total area surveyed was 120 square miles and included A1 Kaim and Istabulat." [G. A. Beazeley: Surveys in Mesopotamia during the War. The Geographical Journal, Vol. 55, No. 2 (Feb. 1920), pp.109-123. Published by Blackwell Publishing on behalf of The Royal Geographical Society (with the Institute of British Geographers)].

- Additional information reads, "The present map version, T.C. 97(B) (FSA A.6 05.1011a), is a copy version of T.C. 97(B) (FSA A.6 05.1011b), with fewer topographical details."

Drawings related primarily to the first campaign of excavation at Sāmarrā' (Iraq), carried out by Ernst Herzfeld on behalf of the Kaiser Friedrich Museum in Berlin in 1911.

Additional information reads, "In July 1911, Herzfeld moved his camp to the eastern bank of the Tigris to the site of Manqūr. The name al-Manqūr designated a vast field of ruins that extended from the southern end of the former built-up areas of Samarra almost to the northern bank of the Qā'in canal's inlet. Herzfeld had been attracted to Manqūr during his earlier visit by a wide arch that stuck out of the ruin, a landmark called 'al-Jamal,' the camel, by the locals. Excavations in a few places within Manqūr and a simultaneous mapping of the site soon made it clear to Herzfeld that he was dealing with a palace of immense dimensions. Soon after the work has started, Herzfeld identified it as a place with the classical name of Balkuwārā or Barkuwārā, a palace from the time of al-Mutawakkil frequently mentioned in the Arabic historical and geographical literature." Drawings related primarily to the first campaign of excavation at Sāmarrā' (Iraq), carried out by Ernst Herzfeld on behalf of the Kaiser Friedrich Museum in Berlin in 1911.

Additional information reads, "During the relatively short period of work at Manqūr / Balkuwārā in the summer and early fall of 1911, Herzfeld's efforts focused mainly on the central reception block between the third courtyard and the so-called river garden above the Tigris, especially on the eastern Īwān and some adjacent easterly rooms. He surveyed the rest of the reception block of the palace, including the cruciform domed hall in the center as well as the courtyard houses and ancillary complexes with the two maidāns to the south and north and added their general outlines, as far as they were visible among the ruins, to the plan. Herzfeld was certainly interested in the main architectonic features of the palace, but at the same time had hoped to uncover new varieties of stucco wall ornaments and to make major ceramic finds. In both he was disappointed. This probably contributed to his decision to stop the work on the site at the end of September 1911." [Leisten, Thomas, 2003: "Excavation of Samarra, v. I. Drawings related primarily to the first campaign of excavation at Sāmarrā' (Iraq), carried out by Ernst Herzfeld on behalf of the Kaiser Friedrich Museum in Berlin in 1911.

Additional information reads, "Much smaller than other palaces, Qaṣr al-ʿĀshiq still has the characteristic structural elements of the grand palace architecture of Samarra. the palace proper, built within an oblong perimeter wall, was protected by an outer enclosure. From Herzfeld's plan and photographs, one has the impression that a double row of rooms was attached to some of the interior segments of the outer wall. No building, however, was either excavated or could be traced completely on the ground. Both enclosure were separated from each other by a moat but also by the element of height: the inner enclosure was built on a plateau 4-5m higher than the surrounding area." Original caption on verso reads, "Samarra. Dj. Mutawakkiliyye."

Additional information reads, "Herzfeld spent not more than two days during the second campaign in the mosque of al-Mutawakkiliyya (June 19-20, 1913), partially excavating the miḥrāb, and 'scraping' - as he admits himself - at the court facade of the transept and in the qibla aisle of the ḥaram, and finally at the plinth of the minaret. While Herzfeld sketched the overall plan of the Great Mosque complex at Mutawakkiliyya in 1913, the final product is based partially on measurements taken by his surveyor, Commander von Ludloff." Drawings related primarily to the first campaign of excavation at Sāmarrā' (Iraq), carried out by Ernst Herzfeld on behalf of the Kaiser Friedrich Museum in Berlin in 1911.

Additional information reads, "During the relatively short period of work at Manqūr / Balkuwārā in the summer and early fall of 1911, Herzfeld's efforts focused mainly on the central reception block between the third courtyard and the so-called river garden above the Tigris, especially on the eastern Īwān and some adjacent easterly rooms. He surveyed the rest of the reception block of the palace, including the cruciform domed hall in the center as well as the courtyard houses and ancillary complexes with the two maidāns to the south and north and added their general outlines, as far as they were visible among the ruins, to the plan. Herzfeld was certainly interested in the main architectonic features of the palace, but at the same time had hoped to uncover new varieties of stucco wall ornaments and to make major ceramic finds. In both he was disappointed. This probably contributed to his decision to stop the work on the site at the end of September 1911." [Leisten, Thomas, 2003: "Excavation of Samarra, v. I. Architecture : Final report of the first campaign 1910-1912. Verlag Philipp von Zabern, Mainz am Rhein, 2003. p.91."]

- Original caption reads, "Samarra, Qubbat al-Sulaibiyya."

- Additional information reads, "Visiting the site of Samarra in 1908, Sarre and Herzfeld had already become interested in the Qubbat al-Şulaibiyya. Herzfeld published preliminary measurements as well as a tentative interpretation of the building as the mausoleum of three of the caliphs of Samarra in 1911. During his absence at the end of June 1911, after some of his most skilled workmen from Hilla had begun to remove the debris in and around the building, Herzfeld returned to the Qubbat al-Şulaibiyya in the early days of December 1911. Between December 3 and 5, additional research was undertaken in the form of a deep sounding within the main chamber of the building that revealed three skeletons." - Original handwritten notes reads, "Haus XIII, from sketch book, Samarra, unpublished."

- The identification of the residential sites: "Herzfeld numbered all sites while the excavation was still in progress. When it became obvious that two courtyards with adjacent rooms turned out to belong to the same complex, however, he assigned new numbers. Herzfeld gave numbers to 16 houses in various locations, splitting certain buildings, [...] naming in all 24 different sites. [...]. Unfortunately, Herzfeld changed the numbering of the houses a third time when he finished the final drawings for the publication, including only 14 houses. [...]. In those cases in which Herzfeld noted on his field sketch either the name of the area or the new numbering of the house we can at least identify the site. [...]" [Leisten, Thomas, 2003: "Excavation of Samarra, v. I. Architecture : Final report of the first campaign 1910-1912. Verlag Philipp von Zabern, Mainz am Rhein, 2003; p.121."]

Original caption on verso reads, "Samarra. Gr. Mosque, unpublished."

Additional information reads, "The quest for exceptional artifacts from the mosque was not very rewarding: with the exception of the minaret, the outer walls were the only remnant of the mosque left standing. All of the interior, as well as the halls of the ziyāda outside had been destroyed and stripped for building materials, especially wood, brick, and marble. Work began on January 9, 1911 with 150 workers outside the mosque right behind the three openings in the center of the qibla aisle, which Herzfeld mistook in the beginning for a triple entrance despite the fact that it was directed towards the qibla and there were no other signs of a mihrāb. The struggle to uncover the 'triple gate' continued through January 25. Only on February 2 was the recessed profile of the mihrāb set in rectangular frame excavated and recognized as part of the prayer niche. Almost simultaneously with the areas in front of the mihrāb and outside the qibla wall, more trenches inside and outside the mosque were opened (January 29). On January 30 the southeastern entrance of the mosque was uncovered, and a day later the southern end of the eastern riwāq investigated. More time was spent examining the fountain in the center of the courtyard, because stucco and mosaic fragments were found there (January 30-February 2). Finally, two more days were invested in making two soundings at the base of the Malwiyya minaret and the northern wall of the mosque at the end of February (25 and 26). The excavation of the congregational mosque at Samarra was closed on February 26, 1911." [Leisten, Thomas, 2003: "Excavation of Samarra, v. I. Additional information reads, "Herzfeld spent not more than two days during the second campaign in the mosque of al-Mutawakkiliyya (June 19-20, 1913), partially excavating the miḥrāb, and 'scraping' - as he admits himself - at the court facade of the transept and in the qibla aisle of the ḥaram, and finally at the plinth of the minaret. While Herzfeld sketched the overall plan of the Great Mosque complex at Mutawakkiliyya in 1913, the final product is based partially on measurements taken by his surveyor, Commander von Ludloff." [Leisten, Thomas, 2003: "Excavation of Samarra, v. I. Architecture : Final report of the first campaign 1910-1912. Verlag Philipp von Zabern, Mainz am Rhein, 2003. p.58."]

The identification of the residential sites: "Herzfeld numbered all sites while the excavation was still in progress. When it became obvious that two courtyards with adjacent rooms turned out to belong to the same complex, however, he assigned new numbers. Herzfeld gave numbers to 16 houses in various locations, splitting certain buildings, [...] naming in all 24 different sites. [...]. Unfortunately, Herzfeld changed the numbering of the houses a third time when he finished the final drawings for the publication, including only 14 houses. [...]. حفريات سامراء (العراق) : الجامع الكبير في إعادة الإعمار ، والمتوكل المحراب

Drawings are arranged roughly in sequential number sequences, housed in document boxes or in flat file folders by size, and stored in the map case drawers.

- Title is provided by Xavier Courouble, FSg Archives cataloger, based on Thomas Leisten's publication, Excavation of Samarra, vol 1.

Drawings related primarily to the first campaign of excavation at Sāmarrā' (Iraq), carried out by Ernst Herzfeld on behalf of the Kaiser Friedrich Museum in Berlin in 1911.

Original caption on verso reads, "Samarra. Gr. Mosque, unpublished, 9 (in red pencil)."

Additional information reads, "Clearing the debris along the inner qibla wall provided evidence that its center had not been occupied by a large triple gate but by a mihrāb of enormous, yet harmonious dimensions flanked by a gate on each side. The actual prayer-niche turned out to be a fairly deep, rectangular recess. Standing in rectangular staggered recesses, a double set of columns flanked the niche. From the fragments found in this spot, Herzfeld concluded that each set of columns had been composed of a pair made of different color marbles. No parts of any of the column's bases were found in the mosque proper. In spite of the mihrāb's complete destruction, a horizontal line visible at the outside of the qibla wall testifies that the projecting mihrāb box originally had a flat roof." Drawings are arranged roughly in sequential number sequences, housed in document boxes or in flat file folders by size, and stored in the map case drawers.

- Title is provided by Xavier Courouble, FSg Archives cataloger, based on Thomas Leisten's publication, Excavation of Samarra, vol 1.

Drawings related primarily to the first campaign of excavation at Sāmarrā' (Iraq), carried out by Ernst Herzfeld on behalf of the Kaiser Friedrich Museum in Berlin in 1911.

Original handwritten notes on drawing reads, "Haus XI H sketchbook; Haus IX; Haus X; from sketch book. Samarra, unpublished."

The identification of the residential sites: "Herzfeld numbered all sites while the excavation was still in progress. When it became obvious that two courtyards with adjacent rooms turned out to belong to the same complex, however, he assigned new numbers. Herzfeld gave numbers to 16 houses in various locations, splitting certain buildings, [...] naming in all 24 different sites. [...] Unfortunately, Herzfeld changed the numbering of the houses a third time when he finished the final drawings for the publication, including only 14 houses. [...] In those cases in which Herzfeld noted on his field sketch either the name of the area or the new numbering of the house we can at least identify the site." Drawings related primarily to the first campaign of excavation at Sāmarrā' (Iraq), carried out by Ernst Herzfeld on behalf of the Kaiser Friedrich Museum in Berlin in 1911.

- Handwritten date and initials on drawing reads, "T. C. B.; 1919."

- Handwritten annotations, probably intended for publication, on drawing reads, "bottom right corner: VII Series. Samarra; top right corner: b'."

- Handwritten annotations, probably added by Joseph Upton, on drawing reads, "D-1103."

- Additional information reads, "During the relatively short period of work at Manqūr / Balkuwārā in the summer and early fall of 1911, Herzfeld's efforts focused mainly on the central reception block between the third courtyard and the so-called river garden above the Tigris, especially on the eastern Īwān and some adjacent easterly rooms. He surveyed the rest of the reception block of the palace, including the cruciform domed hall in the center as well as the courtyard houses and ancillary complexes with the two maidāns to the south and north and added their general outlines, as far as they were visible among the ruins, to the plan. Herzfeld was certainly interested in the main architectonic features of the palace, but at the same time had hoped to uncover new varieties of stucco wall ornaments and to make major ceramic finds. In both he was disappointed. This probably contributed to his decision to stop the work on the site at the end of September 1911." [Leisten, Tomas, 2003: "Excavation of Samarra, v. I. - "During work at a place called Shabbat al-Hawā (which Herzfeld transcribes as Shabbat al-Hawīy) located right on the rift north of the city, they found a pre-Islamic cemetery beneath the Islamic layers. The cemetery, better known from Herzfeld's diary as the Parthian cemetery, was explored between May 15 - 25. No other trace of settlement, which would have explained the existence of a cemetery, was found and Herzfeld decided to give up searching for it." [Leisten, Thomas, 2003: "Excavation of Samarra, v. Original handwritten notes reads, "Haus XIII, Samarra."

The identification of the residential sites: "Herzfeld numbered all sites while the excavation was still in progress. When it became obvious that two courtyards with adjacent rooms turned out to belong to the same complex, however, he assigned new numbers. Herzfeld gave numbers to 16 houses in various locations, splitting certain buildings, [...] naming in all 24 different sites. [...]. Unfortunately, Herzfeld changed the numbering of the houses a third time when he finished the final drawings for the publication, including only 14 houses. [...]. In those cases in which Herzfeld noted on his field sketch either the name of the area or the new numbering of the house we can at least identify the site. [...]" [Leisten, Thomas, 2003: "Excavation of Samarra, v. I. Architecture : Final report of the first campaign 1910-1912. Verlag Philipp von Zabern, Mainz am Rhein, 2003; p.121."]

Additional information reads, "Much smaller than other palaces, Qasr al-Āshiq still has the characteristic structural elements of the grand palace architecture of Samarra. the palace proper, built within an oblong perimeter wall, was protected by an outer enclosure. From Herzfeld's plan and photographs, one has the impression that a double row of rooms was attached to some of the interior segments of the outer wall. No building, however, was either excavated or could be traced completely on the ground. Both enclosure were separated from each other by a moat but also by the element of height: the inner enclosure was built on a plateau 4-5m higher than the surrounding area." Original caption on verso reads, "Samarra. Gr. M."

Additional information reads, "The mosque proper included a prayer hall on the southern side, and riwāqs in the east, west, and north, covering a space of 37,400 square meters. By 1911, the piers and foundations had vanished, scavenged by the local population in search of high-quality bricks, leaving only the empty foundation trenches. With no remnant of the piers proper left, reconstructing their form above ground posed a serious problem. Finally, more careful and cautious excavation uncovered the plaster fragments that had once covered more substantial supports and had left impressions of massive piers among the debris when the support collapsed. The reconstruction proposed that the supports consisted of a square socle on which a composite pier rested, consisting of an octogonal brick core flanked by four marble or granite colonettes. The latter came in only two shapes, cylindrical or octagonal, but in an amazing variety of types and colors of stones." [Leisten, Thomas, 2003: "Excavation of Samarra, v. I. Of this building only the western half, situated between tower 4 and 5, was actually uncovered while the eastern half was reconstructed in Herzfeld's plan according to the results of exploration of the western side. These two wings might have flanked an open courtyard." [Leisten, Thomas, 2003: "Excavation of Samarra, v. I. Architecture : Final report of the first campaign 1910-1912. Additional information reads, "Clearing the debris along the inner qibla wall provided evidence that its center had not been occupied by a large triple gate but by a mihrāb of enormous, yet harmonious dimensions flanked by a gate on each side. The actual prayer-niche turned out to be a fairly deep, rectangular recess. Standing in rectangular staggered recesses, a double set of columns flanked the niche. From the fragments found in this spot, Herzfeld concluded that each set of columns had been composed of a pair made of different color marbles. No parts of any of the column's bases were found in the mosque proper. In spite of the mihrāb's complete destruction, a horizontal line visible at the outside of the qibla wall testifies that the projecting mihrāb box originally had a flat roof." Additional information reads, "It was now well on in May 1917, and the little survey party which had followed the fortunes of the 3rd Corps was at last broken up. I (G. A. Beazeley) was transferred with my computer, to take charge of a detachment of two officers and eight surveyors to carry out a large-scale survey of Samarra and its neighbourhood. The scale selected was the 6-inch, and it was decided to call in the aid of air photographs, which were adjusted to a framework of points fixed by triangulation and plane-table intersection. The congregated photos were then reduced to the 6-inch scale, blue prints prepared and issued to the surveyors, who transferred the detail to their boards and carried out supplementary survey including contouring. The total area surveyed was 120 square miles and included A1 Kaim and Istabulat." [G. A. Beazeley: Surveys in Mesopotamia during the War. Additional information reads, "Coins of the period directly after that of the Kūh-i Kwāja (kkuh-e kwajah) furnish amazing examples. These kings sprawl on their thrones in the most unmannerly way. Bevan calls it a characteristic of the Greek to have the sense of proportion in behavior, which distinguishes what is seemly for the occasion and the person concerned. These figures are impossible in the Ancient East, they are imaginable only after the Greek influence had been at work. But the result is the loss of old dignity, the distortion of the new freedom into a caricature of ill behavior." [Ernst Herzfeld: Archaeological History of Iran. - Title is provided by Xavier Courouble, FSg Archives cataloger, based on Ernst Herzfeld original drawing's caption and Joseph Upton's Catalogue of the Herzfeld Archive.

Ernst Herzfeld first visited Naqsh-i Rostam in November 1905 during his expedition return from the Assur (Kalat Schergat, Iraq) excavation. During the two last months of 1923 as well as early March 1924, in addition of his work on the terrace of Persepolis, Herzfeld spent time at Naqsh-i Rostam checking the inscriptions. In 1928, the architect Friedrich Krefter joined Herzfeld in Persia, in an expedition funded by the Notgemeinschaft der Deutschen Wissenschaft, to complete various measured plans and drawings in Persepolis, Pasargadae, and Naqsh-i Rostam. On March 1, 1931, now under the auspices of the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago, excavations at Persepolis were begun. Ultimately, in 1933, attention was directed to Naqsh-i Rostam, where Herzfeld traced the outer enclosure of the site and copied the inscription on the tomb of Darius I. Ernst Herzfeld left Persepolis permanently in Spring 1934.

Original caption in German reads, "Grabtür Darius I, von innen gesehen (zu Steinmetztechnik Seite 14. unten. FK. 33.)"

Drawings are arranged roughly in sequential number sequences, housed in document boxes or in flat file folders by size, and stored in the map case drawers.

Title is provided by FSg Archives staff based on Alastair Northedge's publication, "An Interpretation of the Palace of the Caliph at Samarra (Dar Al-Khilafa or Jawsaq Al-Khaqani). In Ars Orientalis, Vol. 23."

Drawings related primarily to the second campaign of excavation at Sāmarrā' (Iraq), carried out by Ernst Herzfeld on behalf of the Kaiser Friedrich Museum in Berlin in 1912-1913.

Additional information reads, "At Sāmarrā' there are the remains of a number of 'Abbāsīd walled tracks which appear to be racecourses. Ernst Herzfeld found one track in the course of the German expedition of 1911-13 to the 'Abbāsīd capital at Sāmarrā', and the outline of two more became known from a series of maps of the Sāmarrā' district made by the Mesopotamian Expeditionary Force in 1917. Herzfeld published his first brief discussion of these courses in 1948 in his Geschichte der Stadt Samarra, and a further description was published posthumously in his Persian empire in 1968. [Northedge Alastair, 1990): The Racecourses at Samarra; Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies 53, p.31-56.]
