Biographical Note

The International Battle of the Bands Corporation (IBB) was a Nashville-based promotion founded in 1975 by Mr. Jerry Free. Free, an Ohio native born in 1939, is currently Vice President and General manager of United Gunite Construction, where he began working in 1972. Before he founded the International Battle of the Bands, Free began his professional career as a door-to-door salesman for Look magazine. He remained at Look for 13 years, working his way up to a position on the board of directors in 1968.

Free's battle of the bands concept was not a new idea. Staged competitions between bands had been part of American popular music for most of the 20th century. The purpose of these competitions was to draw audiences to the theaters and music halls where bands would perform during the late afternoons and evenings. These events were a common occurrence in the swing era of the 1930s, as well as in Rhythm and Blues and Jazz in the 1940s and 50s. In the early days of Rock & Roll, fledgling music groups often achieved recognition by winning these types of contests. This local exposure sometimes led to regional and even national recognition. The idea of bringing attention to local artists served as the basis for the International Battle of the Bands. It was referred to by Free as the Agreatest search for new talent. Introducing the band competition into the age of televised coverage and corporate sponsorship enabled Free to take an old idea and transform it into a national enterprise.

With the backing of Seagram=s Seven the International Battle of the Bands Contest got its formal start in 1981. In association with the publishing and recording division of the IBB corporation, the International Battle of the Bands contest was developed with the purpose of discovering and promoting new country music talent. The contest was structured with a series of local and regional competitions, leading up to the Grand Finals held each year, with the exception of 1988, in Nashville, Tennessee. The 1988 finals that were held in Panama City Beach, Florida.

Local auditions were held in IBB affiliated clubs in 50 select cities throughout the United States. Winners of local contests moved on to regional competitions with hopes of reaching the Grand Finals and a chance of a recording contract with IBB records and a one year booking contract with Buddy Lee attractions. While remaining relatively low key in its early years, the IBB Grand Finals were broadcast to a national television audience in a 90 minute program hosted by Sammy Davis, Jr. and Louise Mandrell in 1986.

Container Listing

Series 1.1: International Battle of the Bands, 1981

Scope and Contents: This series contains band, club, and radio contracts, files on the staging of regional, final, and future competitions, sponsorship information, financial records, newspaper clippings, scrapbooks, and promotional materials. The records are arranged chronologically by year of competition and then organized into record groups (e.g., contracts, correspondence, publicity, etc.) For each year=competition. The material within each record group is arranged alphabetically by either name of club or band. Of particular interest in this series are the financial records of the IBB corporation as well as the legal documentation of IBB=s lawsuit against the Anheuser-Busch Corporation. These records may explain why the IBB contests eventually became non-existent. Also of particular interest in this series are the many scrapbooks that contain news clippings, programs, and souvenirs that provide a comprehensive record of each annual competition.

Series 2.1: International Battle of the Bands Publishing, 1981

Scope and Contents: The series contains publishing agreements, written lyrics, sheet music, and correspondence. These records document all interaction between the IBB publishing company and regional contest winning bands and composers. All records in this series are arranged alphabetically by song title. Of particular interest are the composer's agreements that contain sheet music and lyrics for songs performed by regional winning bands.
